

Equipping Women in Ministry

Overview

“God led me into ministry through a moment at a church service my freshman year of college,” Jordan Melgar said.

“He really just laid it on my heart, and I felt like in the middle of the service that I was just supposed to do ministry from there on out with my job.”

Aside from that moment, she shared that the Lord used Scripture and her community to confirm her calling. Reflecting on her experiences, Jordan said, “I’ve seen God work in my life through ministry, just through the ways that he has been able to redeem parts of my story.”

Becoming a Catalyst

One pivotal moment in Melgar’s journey came through her involvement in the Catalyst program, a transformative experience that equipped her with the tools and mentorship needed to thrive in her ministry roles. As a Catalyst, Melgar found guidance and a community of like-minded individuals who shared her calling for ministry.

“The Catalyst program helped prepare me for my current ministry role in a lot of ways,” Melgar explains. “It allowed me to be mentored in what I’m called to do and just get encouraged. It honestly helped me find ways to do ministry at my university.”

Although she felt there were not many opportunities for ministry at the public university she attended, the experience as a Catalyst helped her find ways to do ministry on campus. She felt that the program prepared her for doing ministry in real-world scenarios, a necessary skill for believers as they engage those around them on a daily basis for Christ.

Read the full story.

advance
stories

@scbaptist | scbaptist.org